ORDER ON SUPPLEMENTAL MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

I. INTRODUCTION

Pursuant to the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 (“TEFRA”), petitioners initiated these proceedings to challenge the government’s treatment of partnership items in their 1999 and 2000 tax returns. In Final Partnership Administrative Adjustments (“FPAAs”) issued by the government, petitioners were denied tax losses incurred in connection with their participation in a complex financial product known as a Bond Linked Issue Premium Structure (“BLIPS”). After a lengthy stay and subsequent discovery, the government moved for summary judgment. In an order issued on July 31, 2014 (the “July Order” or the “Order”), the BLIPS transactions were determined to lack economic substance and findings were made regarding the provisional applicability of certain tax penalties at the partnership level.

The government now moves a second time for summary judgment as to the provisional applicability of the substantial understatement penalty. Petitioners have filed their own motion for summary judgment seeking findings that discrete losses and expenses incurred in connection with the BLIPS transactions have independent economic substance and are therefore properly deductible. For the reasons stated below, petitioners’ motion for summary judgment is granted in part and denied in part. To the extent not previously granted by the July Order, the government is entitled to summary judgment on the non-deductibility of the three categories of losses and expenses identified in petitioners' motion. In addition, the government's motion for summary judgment for a finding that the substantial understatement penalty is provisionally applicable at the partnership level is granted.

II. BACKGROUND

The parties' motions implicate a number of issues previously addressed by the July Order. After considering the facts of the case¹ and petitioners' defenses at length, the Order found that the BLIPS transactions were shams and could not be recognized for tax purposes. Shasta Strategic Invest. Fund LLC, et al. v. United States, No. C-04-04264-RS, 2014 WL 3852416, at *9 (N.D. Cal. Jul. 31, 2014). This conclusion was based on two overarching findings. First, the July Order determined—based on objective measures including the “duration of the investments, the source of investment money, and the structure of the loans”—that the BLIPS transactions lacked any true economic substance beyond the generation of tax benefits. Id. at *5-8. Separately, the Order rejected petitioners' claims that their putative profit motive instilled economic substance into otherwise objectively illusory transactions. Id. at *8-9. Petitioners' “self-serving declarations” were not credited, and any “limited questions” possibly remaining as to their subjective intent were deemed insufficient to withstand the government's motion for summary judgment. Id. The July Order expressly concluded that “the BLIPS transactions should be disregarded for tax purposes as provided in the FPAAs.” Id. at *9.

Turning to the next prong of the government's motion, the July Order found that genuine issues of material fact precluded a determination that the negligence penalty provisionally applied at the partnership level. The Order determined, however, that the valuation misstatement penalty was provisionally applicable. Finally, the government prevailed on its argument that the LLC-2 components of the BLIPS products were “tax shelters” as defined by Treasury Regulation § 1.6662-4(g).

III. LEGAL STANDARD

Summary judgment is appropriate “if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.” Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 56(a). The moving party bears the initial burden of demonstrating the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323 (1986); see also Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 56(c)(1)(A). If the movant succeeds, the burden then shifts to the nonmoving party to “set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.” Id. at 322 n.3; see also Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 56(c)(1)(B). A genuine issue of material fact is one that could reasonably be resolved in favor of the nonmoving party, and which could “affect the outcome of the suit.” Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248 (1986). The Court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party and draw all justifiable inferences in its favor. See id. at 255.

IV. DISCUSSION

A. Petitioners’ Motion for Summary Judgment

1. Taxability of Interest Income

Petitioners first contend that interest income derived from the proceeds of loans underlying the BLIPS transactions should be exempt from taxation. There is no dispute that this treatment would be consistent with case law. See Alessandra v. C.I.R., T.C. Memo. 1995-238, at *3 (1995) (taxpayer “not entitled to deduct amounts paid as interest if the underlying transaction is a sham” and by “the same token, a taxpayer need not recognize interest income attributable to a sham transaction.”). Petitioners’ interest expense deductions, which arose out of the sham BLIPS transactions, have been disallowed; consequently, the interest income derived from the loans will not be recognized for tax purposes.

2. *Deductibility of Certain Losses and Expenses*²

Petitioners next move for summary judgment on the deductibility of two categories of losses and expenses incurred by the partnerships in connection with the BLIPS transactions: (1) losses from foreign currency trading activity; and (2) management fees and guaranteed payments. According to petitioners, these losses and expenses are separable from the loans (which, they argue, formed the foundation of the July Order’s economic substance finding) and were sustained in the primary pursuit of genuine profit.

“It is a basic premise of tax law that a transaction devoid of economic substance, or a sham transaction, simply is not recognized for federal taxation purposes, for better or worse.” Alessandra, T.C. Memo 1995-238, at *10 (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). According to the government, this principle should end the discussion. Because the BLIPS transactions have been determined to be shams, it argues, no related deductions—whether arising from the loans, the currency investments, or otherwise—may be taken. Under some circumstances, however, courts have allowed taxpayers to deduct discrete expenses despite the fact that they were incurred in connection with a broader sham transaction. See, e.g., Rice’s Toyota World, Inc. v. Comm’r, 752 F.2d 89, 95-96 (4th Cir. 1985) (“a sham transaction may contain elements whose form reflects economic substance and whose normal tax consequences may not therefore be disregarded”); Bail Bonds by Marvin Nelson, Inc. v. Comm’r, 820 F.2d 1543, 1548-49 (9th Cir. 1987) (reading Rice’s Toyota to stand for the proposition that “indebtedness undertaken to fund a sham transaction is not necessarily a sham”) (emphasis in original).³

² As a consequence of the government’s non-opposition to their argument regarding interest income, petitioners have abandoned the prong of their motion seeking summary judgment on the deductibility of certain state taxes paid in connection with the BLIPS transactions. Consistent with the July Order, these expenses will be disregarded for tax purposes as provided in the FPAAs.

³ More broadly, the Ninth Circuit has declined to adopt the economic substance test articulated by the Fourth Circuit in Rice’s Toyota. Casebeer v. Comm’r, 909 F.2d 1360, 1363 (9th Cir. 1990) (“Several courts, including this circuit, have found that the [Supreme] Court’s holding in Frank Lyon was not intended to outline [the] rigid two-step analysis” applied by Rice’s Toyota).

1 Notwithstanding Rice's Toyota and its progeny, the government contends there is no need 2 to evaluate the individual deductions sought by petitioners because the July Order forecloses 3 characterization of any element of the BLIPS transactions, including the currency investments, as 4 having economic substance. Indeed, the July Order made several determinations specific to the 5 purpose and substance of the currency forward contracts, including findings that the investments 6 had only a "remote likelihood of any profit during" the brief 60-day window during which they 7 were held and were purchased "for the purpose of maintaining the façade of economic activity."
8 2014 WL 3852416 at *7-8. Likewise, petitioners' ostensible subjective belief in the potential 9 profitability of the investments was considered and rejected in "the face of overwhelming 10 evidence to the contrary." Id. at *9. As an element of a broader scheme, the July Order 11 determined, the currency investments lacked "any true economic substance." Id. at *8.

12 Nevertheless, petitioners argue the July Order did not expressly find that the currency 13 investments, independently considered in a vacuum, were a sham. In support of the argument that 14 such individualized, component-level analysis is warranted, petitioners urge reliance on ACM 15 Partnership v. Commissioner, 157 F.3d 231 (3d Cir. 1998). Much of the ACM decision was 16 devoted to affirming the tax court's conclusion that a contingent installment sale transaction 17 lacked economic substance, thus precluding the deduction of certain losses. Id. at 231-60. In so 18 holding, the court of appeals rejected the partnership's professed non-tax justification for 19 purchasing LIBOR notes in connection with the installment sale transaction. Id. at 255-57 ("the 20 acquisition of the LIBOR notes operated to defeat the very purpose which ACM had advanced as a 21 tax-independent justification"). Yet, although they were "not intended to serve non-tax purposes," 22 the court permitted losses stemming from the LIBOR notes to be deducted because the securities 23 were "separable, economically substantive items" and "not the centerpiece of the transactions."
24 Id. at 260-63.

25 Under the circumstances of this case and in light of findings already made, the currency 26 investments cannot be recognized for tax purposes. The July Order determined that the BLIPS 27 transactions were interlinked financial products formulated to produce artificial tax losses for participants.⁴ One element of this integrated transactional structure was a short-term investment in low-risk currency forward contracts whose only purpose was to maintain “the façade of economic activity.” 2014 WL 3852416 at *8. The government argued that the entire scheme lacked economic substance; this court agreed, holding that the “BLIPS transactions should be disregarded for tax purposes as provided in the FPAAs.” Id. at *18. One of the adjustments in the FPAAs was the disallowance of losses stemming from the currency trading activity. The July Order simply leaves no margin for a renewed analysis of the deductibility of these losses. Even if it did, the currency forward contracts are not capable of extrication from the broader tax shelter scheme. They were a significant element of a “turn-key” tax shelter product, serving the purpose of cloaking the BLIPS products with a veneer of substance while subjecting participants to only fleeting exposure to risk. Id. at *1-9.

ACM does not change this conclusion. In a parallel strand of authority, other courts have held that the “overall transaction . . . must have economic substance before” subcomponents may be deducted.⁵ Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc. v. Comm’r, 113 T.C. 254, 279 (1999), citing Lee v. Comm’r, 155 F.3d 584, 587 (2d Cir. 1998). “If this were not the rule, every tax shelter, no matter how transparently sham,” could nonetheless qualify for deductions. Winn-Dixie, 113 T.C. at 279, quoting Lee, 155 F.3d at 587. Given the prepackaged nature of the BLIPS products at issue here, the Lee rule is a better fit than the approach possibly dictated by ACM. Separate evaluation of the deductibility of each subcomponent of the BLIPS product—and, specifically, the currency forward contracts—is unwarranted.⁶

⁴ As petitioners themselves argued in their opposition to the government’s first motion for summary judgment, “the premium loan and foreign currency transactions went hand-in-hand.” Dkt. 233 at 21.

⁵ At issue in both Lee and Winn-Dixie was the deductibility of interest expenses arising from genuine indebtedness incurred in connection with sham transactions. Lee, 155 F.3d at 586; Winn-Dixie, 113 T.C. at 279.

⁶ In a similar but distinct argument, petitioners claim that even if a transaction has been held to lack economic substance, the deductibility of individual losses and expenses must still be evaluated under 26 U.S.C. § 165(c). Petitioners’ own authorities demonstrate otherwise. Keeler v. Comm’r, 243 F.3d 1212 (10th Cir. 2001). In Keeler, the court of appeals made clear that (1) a

In passing, petitioners point out that the government conceded the deductibility of the BLIPS currency trading losses in the related Klamath litigation. They make little of this argument, though, perhaps because it demonstrates key distinctions between that case and this one. In Klamath, the district court was asked to determine only whether the loans central to the BLIPS transactions lacked economic substance. Klamath Strategic Inv. Fund, LLC v. United States (Klamath II), 472 F. Supp. 2d 885, 896, 897-98, 905 (E.D. Tex. 2007). The court answered this question in the affirmative, but it did not make findings regarding the economic substance of the BLIPS transactions as a whole. Compare Klamath II, 472 F. Supp. 2d. at 898 (“the loan transactions lacked economic substance”) with July Order, 2014 WL 3852416, at *18 (“the BLIPS transaction lacked economic substance”).

Moreover, the Klamath district court found that the individual BLIPS investors in that case had specifically sought out the forward contracts with the primary motive of making a profit; in fact, the currency investments were the animating purpose behind their participation in BLIPS. 472 F. Supp. 2d at 888, 891. In a corollary determination predicated on these unique facts, the court also found that the two partnerships at issue had not participated in the BLIPS scheme for the purpose of achieving artificial tax losses. Id. at 891 n.9 (“If they were only seeking tax benefits, then they would have entered into the transaction in 1999 . . . instead of waiting until 2000.”), affirmed in part by 568 F.3d 537, 551 (5th Cir. 2009) (“the district court concluded that the partners had different motivations: [the Klamath taxpayers] at all times pursued the investment strategy with a genuine profit motive, while Presidio’s primary intent was to achieve a tax benefit”).⁷ Based on these facts, the government did not contest (on appeal, at least) finding of no economic substance or (2) a finding that a particular expense is not deductible under the relevant Internal Revenue Code provision would each be independently sufficient to bar deduction of that expense. Id. at 1220. Here, because the BLIPS transactions have been determined to be shams, there is no need to take the second step.

⁷ Although the two partnerships at issue in Klamath withdrew from the investments early like other investors, the district court found that they “did not have an understanding of the significant tax loss that would be generated by withdrawing at the end of the 60 day period.” 472 F. Supp. 2d at 893.

1 deductions based on the losses the Klamath partnerships had incurred in connection with the 2 currency trading strategy—presumably because the district court had already determined the 3 partnerships had a genuine profit motive. 568 F.3d at 549, n.5.

4 These proceedings, in contrast, are focused only on objective and subjective indicia of 5 economic substance at the Presidio principal-level. Such indicia were considered at length in the 6 July Order, which found that the BLIPS transactions—not merely the underlying loans—were 7 shams and should be disregarded for tax purposes. Petitioners have failed to demonstrate that the 8 July Order leaves any room for the relief they request. Flowing from this determination, 9 petitioners have not shown that management fees and guaranteed payments remitted in connection 10 with the BLIPS products are separable from the overall sham transaction. Because they were paid 11 as transaction costs incident to an integrated scheme that lacked economic substance, the expenses 12 and taxes identified by petitioners cannot be deducted. Klamath Strategic Inv. Fund ex rel. St.
13 Croix Ventures v. United States, 568 F.3d 537, 550 (5th Cir. 2009) (“expenses incurred in 14 connection with a sham transaction are generally not deductible”); New Phoenix Sunrise Corp. v.
15 Comm’r, 132 T.C. 161, 186 (2009) (fees paid to “implement a transaction” that lacked economic 16 substance cannot be deducted); Napoliello v. Comm’r, T.C. Memo. 2009-104, at *7 (2009) 17 (“petitioner may not deduct costs incurred to implement a transaction that lacks economic 18 substance”), affirmed by 655 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2011).

19 For the foregoing reasons, petitioners’ motion for summary judgment is granted in part as 20 to the non-taxability of the loan income and is otherwise denied. To the extent the July Order did 21 not explicitly so find, the government is entitled to summary judgment on the non-deductibility of 22 those losses and expenses specified in the FPAAs.

23 B. Government’s Motion for Summary Judgment

24 In its motion, the government seeks summary judgment on the provisional applicability of the 25 substantial understatement penalty. To obtain summary judgment, the government must clear two 26 hurdles. First, it must demonstrate that a partnership-level finding on substantial understatement is 27 authorized because the penalty “relates to an adjustment to a partnership item.” 26 U.S.C. § 6226(f). If jurisdiction exists and the penalty provisionally applies, the government must further show there are no disputed issues of material fact as to petitioners' defenses to the penalty.

1. Provisional Applicability of Substantial Understatement Penalty

The Supreme Court's recent opinion in United States v. Woods defines the contours of a district court's authority to make penalty findings at the partnership level. 134 S. Ct. 557 (2013). Woods makes clear that under section 6626(f), "the court may decide only whether adjustments properly made at the partnership level have the potential to trigger the penalty." Id. at 564. Put another way, there is authority to make findings as to the provisional applicability of those penalties that "could result from an adjustment to a partnership item." Id. The "determination that a partnership lacks economic substance" qualifies as an "adjustment to a partnership item" for purposes of the TEFRA provisional applicability inquiry. Id. at 563. In determining whether a penalty provisionally applies, the court must consider a petitioner's argument that the relevant FPAA adjustments are "categorically incapable of triggering the penalty." Id. at 564.

The FPAAs have the potential to trigger the substantial understatement penalty. As described in the July Order, the net result of BLIPS was to create a tax loss for the client through an artificially inflated outside basis in the LLC-2. 2014 WL 3852416 at *3-7. Consistent with the determination that the BLIPS transactions lacked economic substance, tax losses stemming from partners' claimed outside basis in the LLC-2s will be disregarded. This creates the potential for partner-level understatements of tax in excess of $5,000 or 10%. In considering whether a penalty provisionally applies, a court is "not required to shut its eyes" to the likely impact of adjustments. Woods, 134 S. Ct. at 565; VisionMonitor Software, LLC v. Comm'r, T.C. Memo 2014-182 (2014) (provisionally applying substantial understatement penalty although actual "determination of an underpayment cannot happen at the partnership level").

Petitioners contend that, unlike the negligence and valuation misstatement penalties, the substantial understatement penalty is not susceptible to provisional application because it does not flow inevitably from the partnership adjustments. This is not the relevant test; the government

1 must merely demonstrate that the adjustments at issue might potentially trigger the 2 penalty. Woods, 134 S. Ct. at 564. Consistent with this requirement, Woods permits petitioners to 3 foreclose provisional application of a penalty by showing that an adjustment is “incapable of 4 triggering the penalty”—that it has no potential to cause the penalty to apply at the partner 5 level. Id. Petitioners have made no such showing here.

6 Engaging in an item-by-item analysis of the Belford partnership return, petitioners further 7 attempt to demonstrate that myriad unknown variables might impact whether BLIPS partners have 8 indeed substantially understated their tax liability. Again, such uncertainty is immaterial. See 9 Woods, 134 S. Ct. at 564 (“[I]mposing a penalty always requires some determinations that can be 10 made only at the partner level. Even where a partnership’s return contains significant errors, a 11 partner may not have carried over those errors to his own return; or if he did, the errors may not 12 have caused him to underpay his taxes by a large enough amount to trigger the penalty.”) If, in 13 subsequent partner-level proceedings, it is determined that a particular BLIPS participant did not 14 substantially understate his tax liability, that partner will not be subject to the penalty. If, in 15 contrast, another BLIPS participant’s return reflects a deficiency greater than $5000 or 10%, that 16 partner may be subject to the penalty. Under the latter set of circumstances, this court’s 17 partnership-level determination of whether certain defenses to that penalty apply will help produce 18 consistent outcomes, as intended by TEFRA. See NPR Investments, LLC ex rel. Roach v. United 19 States, 740 F.3d 998, 1012 (5th Cir. 2014) (substantial authority is a “question common to all 20 [partners] and does not depend on an individual taxpayer’s circumstances”).

21 2. Reasonable Cause

22 Although it has already been determined that they lack a partnership-level reasonable cause 23 defense to accuracy penalties, petitioners seek to revive this defense as it relates to the loss and 24 expense deductions addressed in their motion for summary judgment. It would make little sense, 25 however, to hold that petitioners have a reasonable cause defense for some partnership items and 26 not others where the entire BLIPS scheme has been determined to lack economic 27 substance. Consistent with this order’s determination that the deductibility of the losses and 28

1 expenses identified in petitioners' motion has been settled by the July Order, there is no basis to 2 reconsider petitioners' entitlement to the reasonable cause defense.

3 3. Substantial Authority

4 In addition to finding the substantial and gross valuation misstatement penalties 5 provisionally applicable and denying summary judgment on the negligence penalty, the July Order 6 determined that the LLC-2s qualified as "tax shelters" under the Treasury Regulations. As a 7 consequence of this finding, to prevent provisional application of the substantial understatement 8 penalty petitioners must show that: (1) there was substantial authority for the tax treatment of the 9 partnership item; and (2) they reasonably believed the tax treatment of that item was more likely 10 than not the proper treatment. Treas. Reg. § 1.6662-4(g)(1)(i)(A)-(B). The substantial authority 11 standard is objective, and will be met where the "weight of the authorities supporting the treatment 12 is substantial in relation to the weight of the authorities supporting contrary treatment." Id. at § 13 1.6662-4(d)(3).

14 The question of substantial authority was addressed by the July Order in connection with its 15 finding that the LLC-2s were tax shelters. In relevant part, the Order reasoned that substantial 16 authority did not support petitioners' treatment of the BLIPS loan premiums as contingent. 2014 WL 17 3852416 at *11. The government seeks to translate this reasoning into a broader finding that the 18 BLIPS transactions, taken in their entirety, were not backed by substantial authority.

19 As they have done throughout this round of briefing, petitioners attempt to reframe the issue.
20 They contend that the question is not whether treatment of the loan premiums as contingent was 21 justified. Instead, petitioners argue, the relevant inquiry at this stage is whether other collateral 22 deductions were supported by substantial authority. This argument dovetails with the central premise 23 of petitioners' motion—that "a sham transaction may contain elements whose form reflects economic 24 substance and whose normal tax consequences may not therefore be disregarded." Rice's Toyota 25 World v. Comm'r, 752 F.2d 89, 96 (4th Cir. 1985). As noted above, however, the Rice's Toyota 26 principle is inapplicable here; it does not mandate that the BLIPS transactions be disaggregated into 27 their component parts for purposes of determining whether penalties are provisionally

1 applicable. Accordingly, petitioners' proposed framework—whereby they would be permitted to 2 argue substantial authority independently for every individual deduction claimed in connection with 3 the BLIPS transactions—will not be adopted.

4 Turning to the question of whether substantial authority supported the BLIPS transactions 5 generally, the July Order determined that the two primary authorities cited in KPMG's opinion letter 6 were inapposite and did not justify the tax positions taken by the partnerships. 2014 WL 3852416 at 7 *9 (agreeing with cases holding that "Helmer is inapplicable in this situation" and further determining 8 that "LaRue is also inapplicable"). The July Order's determination that the BLIPS transactions were a 9 sham is also central to this analysis. Stobie Creek Investments, LLC v. United States, 82 Fed. Cl.
10 636, 707 (2008) ("no substantial authority exists to support recognition of tax results that are 11 premised on transactions with no appreciable business purpose beyond conferring tax benefits"). The 12 relevant inquiry for purposes of determining whether the substantial understatement penalty 13 provisionally applies is not whether discrete aspects of the transaction might—if they had not been part 14 and parcel of a sham—have been otherwise treated properly on the returns. The question is whether 15 the tax positions claimed in connection with the BLIPS products, taken as a whole, were authorized.

16 Petitioners do not seriously contest that the primary purpose and outcome of the BLIPS 17 products—the creation of large tax losses through the artificial inflation of partners' outside basis in 18 the LLC-2s—was unsupported by substantial authority. Accordingly, that defense is inapplicable here 19 and cannot be relied upon to support the validity of other related tax deductions stemming from the 20 transactions. Because petitioners have not demonstrated that substantial authority supported the 21 BLIPS transactions, there is no need to address the question of whether they had a reasonable belief in 22 the propriety of the tax treatment they claimed.

23 V. CONCLUSION

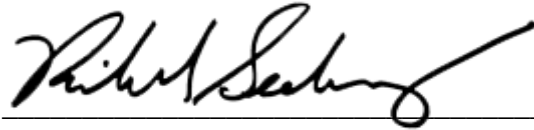

24 In some cases, courts have found discrete, economically substantive components of sham 25 transactions to be separable from the larger scheme and thus potentially deductible. This is not 26 such a case. In evaluating the prepackaged tax shelter product at issue here, it would be misguided 27 to discriminate among the various transactional elements and find that some were instilled with 1 economic substance while others were not.

2 As a result, petitioners' motion for summary judgment is granted in part as to the non-3 taxability of the loan income and is otherwise denied. The government is entitled to summary 4 judgment finding that losses and expenses stemming from the BLIPS transactions, as specified in 5 the FPAAs, will be disregarded for tax purposes and cannot be deducted. The government's 6 separate motion is granted: the substantial understatement penalty provisionally applies at the 7 partnership level. No later than three weeks from the date of this order, the parties shall each 8 submit a letter to the court clarifying their respective positions on what partnership-level issues, if 9 any, remain in these related cases.
